We can do better.

The mass media have always been under the microscope, but now the scrutiny has never been greater. Next target of the Tea Party? Fox News. A TV network that once served as a mouthpiece for conservatives is now taking a hard look at its own role in the political fray. Fox News has made no secret of its bias against President Obama and the Democrats, and now it appears that the network is facing a reckoning.

The network's ratings have slipped, and advertisers are beginning to pull their support. This is a sign that the public is waking up to the reality that Fox News is not a neutral source of news. It is a powerful player in the political landscape, and its influence cannot be ignored.

But the network is not alone. Other cable news outlets are also feeling the heat. CNN, for example, is facing criticism for its coverage of the protests. The network has taken a hard line against the demonstrators, and some viewers are calling for a boycott.

The media landscape is changing, and it is up to us to ensure that our voices are heard. We must demand more from the networks, and we must support those who are doing it right. The future of journalism is in our hands, and we must be an informed and engaged audience.
